Researchers have wild animals, such as great apes, dolphins, and even some birds, feel grief at the loss of loved ones and dead. Elephants also do these things. When a group member dies, the other elephants often stay the dead body and keep touching it for many hours, sometimes even days. They actually shed tears and even try to cover the branches.

Elephants remember and mourn their loved ones even many their death. When they walk past the place of their loved one's death, they stop and stand still for several minutes. It is almost certain that elephants have a death and therefore pay respect to the dead.
